Symphony Numbers Leave Impression on Crowd.

PORTLAND ACQUIRES HABIT

Applause Is Frequent and Strong, Several Selections Inspiring Audience to Call Those Who Had Especially Pleased.

It was a crowd of cheerful-looking neopie, and Broadway near Taylor was jammed with them yesterday afternoon. They all seemed to be going the one way, and, so far as I could hear from uttered remarks, the talk was all about symphony.

Somehow, the atmosphere and the scene reminded me of scenes around the Boston Music Hall, many years ago, when I, then a raw music student recently arrived from Europe, joined the crowds attending the sublime concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. But with this difference: The Boston crowd had that ultra-serious blue-stocking.

with this difference: The Boston crowd had that ultra-serious, blue-stocking, be-spectacled look about it, and the atmosphere was generally whipped by New England storms.

Yesterday's audience was composed of bright-cheeked, bright-eyed, non-spectacled folks who took their symphony treat more cheeffully, more comprehensively than my old Boston friends. The Portland symphony lesson seems to "aoak in" better, although the applause is more openly expressed.

NOMINATION IS NEXT WEEK

Symphony Habit Is Formed. That is to say: Portland has at last got the symphony habit, and the mind of the audience prepared by years of music missionary work, now thinks in terms of symphony appreciation. A symphony habit is of siow, but sure, growth.

growth. Yesterday's concert had a diversified programme of musical brightness. The programme was one glad message, and there wasn't the suggestion of a "grouch" in it. The audience was the largest and most enthusiastic of the entire series. Practically every seat at the Hellig, about 2300 in number, was occupied downstairs, balcony, gallery and private boxes.

Portland has a speaking acquaintancy ith the symplectic with the symphony of yesterday, overak's "No. 5, in E Minor," from "The New World," written by the Bohemian composer when he lived in New York aty. It reflects American negro meloand, consequently, is merry parkling.

One wonders what would have happened to that music score had Dyorak gone for his inspiration, his basic foundation, to an earlier American music course—the American Indian. If Dyorak had, the chances are that his "New World Symphony" would have been more serious in character. The gem of yesterday's rendition of the Dyorak number was the oboe solo obligato, exquisitely played by Frederick C. Starke, once an oboe player with the Theodore Thomas orchestra in Chinago. The entire rendition of this symphony was characterized by wonderful smoothness and real professional finish. Oboe Solo Is Fascinating.
