THE SANDMAN STORY

BY MRS. F. WALKER

The Golden Web.
ONCE upon a time there lived a beautiful Princess whose father's country extended from one ocean to the other. It was full of happy people, but the King was very sad. And the reason was that his only child, the Princess, was so delicate that it was impossible for her even to walk.

All day long she lay in a bed of softest silk on a mattress of pillows stuffed with swan's down. But still she did nothing but moan, for the touch of even the softest thing seemed to hurt her. The poor King was almost wild with worry and the Queen grew so gray that all the hairdressers in the kingdom could not keep her curls brown.

Cecil was a poor boy who worked about the gardens. He had seen the Princess and felt very sorry for her as he worked over his flowers. All day he hoed and weeded and so long was he of the plants that he sometimes imagined that they talked among themselves. One day he saw growing a very strange plant which he had never seen before. Its stem was of silver, its leaves of gold and on top was a tiny cup of pearl filled with what seemed a sweet dew.

So, without thinking, the boy plucked the bloom and drank the dew. It had an odd effect, for as soon as he had swallowed it he found he could hear everything going on around him—the grass growing, the leaves sighing and the whispers of the roses. Even the chat of the butterflies and insects he understood.

As Cecil went about his work he saw that another plant was covered with spiderwebs, so he got his broom and was about to brush the web away when the mother spider came running out from under a leaf.
"Oh! what shall I do?" she cried—and Cecil knew every word she said.
"That great man is going to destroy my home and my babies."
"Oh, no," said Cecil, laying down the broom. "I will not touch you at all."
"How can I thank you?" inquiringly asked the mother spider. Cecil laughed, but a funny thought popped into his head.
"There is only one thing in the world I wish," he replied. "And that is something which could cure the Princess. But, of course, that is not in your power."
"Maybe it is," replied the spider. "No one ever understood how to talk to us before. But we spiders have talked it over and we learned that up in the great White Vine is a golden spider, who spins a golden web so fine that it can hardly be seen. The only way to reach this vine is to get on a log which is drifting down the Black Whirlpool, and the current will drag you down under the banks till you float far under the shore. About a mile away from the pool is the vine hanging over the water and there you will see a golden web stretching away for 10 miles."
Without waiting a moment Cecil ran as fast as his legs could carry him to where a black stream of water whirled around and around at a dizzy rate. Long ere he was out of sight he disappeared, but no one had ever ventured into its depth. Cecil jumped on a tree trunk as it swept by and in a moment was carried swiftly down the whirlpool and under the bank.

It was dark and the roar of the water almost deafened him, but he clung desperately to the log which at last swept under a great white vine. Over the vine was a misty, golden web which seemed to reach to the ends of the earth.
Cecil reached up and pulled it toward him till he had an armful of its lustrous folds, then the log went plunging on, and at last swung out of the stream and into a river, across which it peacefully floated. The boy looked about and found he was at a moment his own garden. As the log touched the shore he stepped off and ran to the castle.

All the courtiers crowded about him and gazed in wonder at the beautiful web of gold which gleamed in his arms. "It is for the Princess," he panted. "Wrap her in it—it will make her well." So the courtiers gathered and seized the web, ran to the bed of the Princess and wrapped its shining mesh around her. It was so deliciously soft that she smiled in delight. In another moment she rose to her feet and stood up, very well and laughing.
"I have always said I would marry the one who would cure my father," she said. Cecil stood before her and finished the story of his adventure. "You have risked your life for me and brought me health. Now you shall be my husband."

So Cecil and the Princess were married and when the old King died they ruled their happy country for long years.

PORTLAND MILK SUPREME
Butterfat Content 4.1 Per Cent
Against 3.7 in New York.

That Portland has a much richer quality of milk than New York is attested by a report received yesterday by City Health Officer Marcellus from New York showing that the average butter fat in the first-class milk of that city is 3.7 per cent. Portland's average for the same class of milk is 4.1 per cent.
Dr. Marcellus says reports of other cities show similar conditions, the Portland supply leading by a long margin in the percentage of cream.
