"It will be an infielder, and possibly Vaughn," said Mack. "He ought to be a star out here, and, if he is the right sort, will get the job."

While the captaincy of the Portland club is about as important as being a jitney inspector in Thibet, Mack has to mighty careful in his distribution of the plum.

Back in 1912 when the go-by was given Tommy Sheehan, Mack awarded the captaincy to Bill Rodgers and it nearly disrupted the morale of his team. Bill Rapps, veteran first sacker, had his eye on the job and the bad feeling engendered by this appointment of the youngster at second resulted in Rapp's being railroaded out of the league the following Winter.

He is now in the Western League.

After one disastrous year Rodgers made good in the dual capacity of cap-tain and second sacker, and he helped McCredie pilot two pennant winners, 1913 and 1914, down the crooked turnpike of success.

Last year McCredie named Speas as captain. While Speas was a veteran and a born diplomat, some slight bickering cropped out during the season. months. Ever since the beginning of Speas somewhat resented the fact that the first semester an attempt has been made to induce wider sport participation among the students.
