Prisoner Says He Worked on Portland's First Grain Ship.

Sprightly Irishman of 70, Whose Acquaintance With Black Bottle Was Disastrous, Talks History.

His name, his eyes and his laugh were all Irish. A few days in the City Jail constituted an incident that he greatly concerns. He was in prison he carried his 70 years with gay lightness. "I used to be in Portland years and years ago," he observed to Jailer Webster. The officer encouraged him with a nod.

"I was a longshoreman, too, them days," he rambled reminiscently. "I helped to load the first vessel that ever carried wheat direct from Portland to any foreign port. She was the full-rigged ship, the Annie M. Small, and the year was 1871 or '72—I disremember, but it was somewhere about that time. "She sailed under the American flag, the Annie M. Small did, for Bristol, England, where her cargo of wheat brought 6 pounds 10 shillings a ton. "Longshoremen didn't know anything about stowing wheat. We piled the sacks straight up against the ship's skin. It tumbled down many a time, and we had it all to do over again. That was a grand price for wheat. The Annie M. Small paid for herself that passage, they say."

MISSING

W. R. Canfield, who disappeared from his home west of Vancouver, Wash., on Wednesday, April 19. The above picture is a good likeness with exception that he is now somewhat shaven. When last seen Mr. Canfield was on his way to consult a physician.

Longshoreman, sailor and rough-fisted seeker of adventure and wage in the ports of all the world, he was back to Portland again, after many years. It was a wholly incidental and unpremeditated bout with the "black bottle" that had felled him—in the town where he pioneered by planting poplar trees.

Two days ago his brief sentence expired. With the stubby gray mustache bristling aggressively, the blue Irish eyes twinkling, and the stride of a land on his first adventure, the old longshoreman went somewhere.

He cannot be recalled to threaten the matter out with George H. Himes, of the Oregon Historical Society, though the meeting would doubtless be mutually welcomed.

The first vessel to load wheat from Portland to a foreign port sailed in 1888, says Mr. Himes. The cargo was furnished by Joseph Watt, of Yamhill County.
