Pearl the most beautiful woman on earth, and all came out without breaking the spell.

Now, they happened to live a lad named Tommy, the son of a wood-chopper, who declared that he would try his luck. Tommy was poor, ragged, with red hair and freckled face, but he was honest and truthful.

"I have come to see the Princess," he said. "I would like to try my luck." So Tommy was led into the great glass palace lit by lamps and brilliant with artificial light.

"Why, madam," he replied, "it is so funny in here. The roses and violets are of cloth, not like the ones in my garden; these, you see, are all painted and your body looks so odd fixed up in that style."

Then a wonderful thing happened: the wind rose and blew the glass palace away. The artificial flowers went with it, and there they all stood in the real garden with the sunlight playing about their heads.

"The lad has broken the spell by telling the truth," laughed the Wizard. "It is hard for princesses to hear that, for every one will flatter them. That is the reason the lords and dukes did not succeed. But this honest boy saw through the shams and spoke the facts. That broke the spell I put on you. And now your father must keep his word."

Somehow the Princess made no objection at all—she was tired of the silly, simpering nobles, and thought she must never live in the air; if a ray of sunlight should touch her she would die. And now she would know how to break the spell. There is one way, and one way alone, to do that, but it will never know till some lucky one happens upon the magic. And the wicked old fellow walked away to his hut.

From that day on the King and Queen never let the sun's rays touch the child. She was obliged to live in a great glass palace which was heated and lighted by artificial means. Everything in it was the same. The flowers were of wax and paper, the fountains of perfume and even the people who attended her got so at last that they liked nothing natural. They painted and powdered so and wore high-heeled shoes and adopted such outrageous fashions that there was nothing natural about them.

When the Princess was 21 the King was very anxious to have her released from the spell. So he sent a proclamation over the country saying that any one who could release the Princess would have half the kingdom. Dozens of suitors tried, but all went in with compliments on their lips, declaring

"You'll have to bring in the wood tonight," he said to his younger brother in a joking manner.

"I know it, but you'll have to cut it," was the answer. "I know it."

The wood was never cut and shortly afterwards the boy disappeared, but the act caused no disturbance until late in the evening.
