She did not see the round stone in her path. Her foot struck it and with a cry she felt herself fall lown till she hit plum on a soft mound of snow at the foot of the embankment. But in a moment she was on her feet. Yet the place now seemed strange.

Down a stony road tramped a long procession of people with a queer look in their faces. Some wore clothing suited for Summer, some had on furs and others were pedaling along on bicycles. Suddenly it began to rain, but in a moment it turned to snowing, and the people ran wildly about. Then the sun came out hotly and some faintthe sun came out hotly and some faint-

Laura ate a big supper and felt better. Then she resolved to be brave and start right in now helping her mother. So she explained to Mrs. Edwards the hard luck in which her mother was and asked if the bill could be settled. Mrs. Edwards not only paid at once the full amount, but gave Laura a big cake, a bag of apples and a ham and sent the girl home in the carriage.

As the horses stopped the mother threw open the door, showing a pale, anxious face in the light.
