KING'S JOB ABOUT AS BIG AS THAT OF BRIDEGROOM

our midst. I dropped over to see 'em yesterday afternoon and found them in an undecorated bower. Not a rose or a carnation, but a bunch of wild flowers, a personal friend had sent. The Queen had walked on roses, eaten 'em, slept on a bed of 'em—her room took like a garden, you've read of her smile, her hair, her teeth, the size of her shoe and her aim in life. And the King hadn't a rose to his name.

ALL ATTENTION FOR QUEEN

His eagle-eye and rosy cheeks, his outdoor bigness and democratic ways, his infectious hearty laugh and his interesting ideas of life in his Western country were all shut in by the four walls of a room. He was surrounded by me, while mobs fell all over each other and brothers became foes in their efforts to see the Queen.
