

DANGER FOR HUGHES IS SEEN IN OREGON

If Progressive Presidential Electors Remain on Ticket, Vote Would Be Split.

WAY OUT IS BEING SOUGHT

No Provision Made for Withdrawal of Candidates Nominated in Primaries, but Leaders Believe Solution Can Be Found.

What will be the status of the Progressive Presidential electors nominated at the recent Oregon primary if, as now seems probable, Charles E. Hughes, the Republican nominee, also is made the Progressive party candidate for President?

This is a question that is perplexing both Republican and Progressive leaders in the state, and incidentally causing more or less quiet amusement for the Democrats.

It appears that the law makes no provision for the withdrawal of a candidate for office after the nominating primaries. Under the legal restrictions it will be necessary for two full sets of five Republican nominees and five Progressive nominees to continue as candidates for electors, even though they have no common candidate for President.

Of course, if Colonel Roosevelt reconsiders his decision to decline the Progressive nomination, and becomes the candidate of that party, or if the Progressive National Committee places Victor Murdock or Governor Johnson, of California, or some other person at the head of their ticket, the five Oregon candidates will have a political as well as a legal cause for their existence.

Hughes' Indorsement Expected. It is presumed that the Colonel will not be a candidate, and that the Progressive committee will fall in line with the rank and file of their party and indorse the nomination of Hughes.

In that event the name of Hughes will appear on the ballot of Oregon as the Republican-Progressive nominee; but the law does not make provision for a combination of the candidates of the two parties for Presidential elector.

Unless a way can be found to permit the legal withdrawal of these candidates, the Republicans and Progressives will be confronted next November with the dangerous situation of a single Presidential candidate and 10 prospective elector voters.

Situation Deemed Dangerous. This situation is regarded as dangerous, because the Republican and Progressive voters can unite in their support of Hughes, and Hughes can carry the state by a substantial plurality over Wilson, yet the vote on electors could be so divided up among the 10 candidates that the five Democratic electors would be elected.

Even though Hughes should carry the state against Wilson, the five Democratic elector candidates, if they received more votes than the five highest of the group of Republican and Progressive candidates, Oregon's five electoral votes would go to Wilson, and it is possible for this to happen, unless a means can be found to permit the withdrawal of either the Republican group of five or the Progressive group of five. In the interests of complete harmony among the two parties it has been suggested that two Republicans and three Progressives be permitted to withdraw.
