WOMEN WHO LEAD THE WAY

Mrs. P. J. McEvoy—"The Apple Queen."
Mrs. P. J. McEvoy, who owns and operates her own apple orchard in New Burnside, Ill., is considered the foremost authority in that state on apple culture. The tract of land which she has under cultivation as an apple orchard includes 125 acres.

This autumn about 30 carloads of apples will be harvested from the orchard and, as during the past few years, big apple merchants from Cleveland, Cincinnati, Chicago, Memphis and many other places will rush in to place their bids for the best of her stock. Mrs. McEvoy is 65 years of age, but she will meet them when they come as she has met them during the past five years, and her dealings will be as shrewd and honest as those of the best of business men. This is only one of the things that make Mrs. McEvoy remarkable.

Another is that she has never known discouragement, however unfavorable circumstances seemed to be. She became a widow at 55. Her possessions so clumsy he has no use for you, I suppose."

"Shall we tell him?" said one stalk to the other.

"Yes, tell him and take the conceit out of him once and for all. He will never believe if someone does not tell him the truth," was the reply.

"You have been so disagreeable and conceited that we have decided to tell you what is the matter with you," said the first stalk.

"At first we were sorry for you, but your boasting has changed all that. You are an empty stalk and worthless to the farmer. That is why you were not cut with the rest of us, and the reason you were so straight and held your head so high was that you were empty, while we were full of good corn."

"Now the heavy winds have blown you to the ground, where you will stay until the farmer comes to take you away and tomorrow we will leave you alone while we go to the barn to be useful in the world."

The straight stalk was too overcome to reply and he did not really believe his brother stalk until the farmer and his men gathered in the corn the next day and he was left behind on the ground.

And so, like the cornstalk, some people hold their heads too high and look with pity upon their poorer brothers, when it is the short brothers who would pity them if they had time to think about them at all.

included 40 acres of apple orchard bearing fruit to a certain extent; 85 acres of orchard, where the trees were nonfruitful and an overshadowing mortgage that was almost due.

She knew little of business, of finance or apple orchards. But she did know that the mortgage threatened to devour her few earthly possessions and that the only way to prevent it was to pay it off. She had no money and no means of raising it in time. But she went to her creditors and asked that she be given a few months in which to meet their claims. They consented to allowing her two years' time.

There was no one to help, and only the orchard as a means of raising the money. All day and all night through the first years she strove to make her orchard pay. During the early spring she spent long nights burning brush beneath the trees to keep the frost away. Through the summer months she cooked the poisons with which to spray the trees, and did the work with her own hands. When autumn came she herself carried the straw with which the ground was padded to keep free from bruises the falling apples, that they might be marketed.

Through the Winters she worked in knee-deep snow, wrapping up the young trees so that the rabbits would not eat the bark. Through the chilling days of the early Springs she waged her fight against the pests that spot the fruit.

But every year brought a little more of success and a little less of adversity until within the allotted time the mortgage was paid. Her first year's crop was but about two carloads of an inferior kind of fruit. Since then it has grown to 30 carloads that are the envy of Illinois fruit farmers.

THE SANDMAN STORY

By MRS. F. A. WALKER

THE REPLY OF THE FULL CORNSTALK.
ONCE upon a time in a corn field when the moon was shining and all the world was asleep, a slender cornstalk, swayed in the cool breeze, which blew over the fields and looked about.

"Well, well," it said to itself, "how tall I am and how straight I am; the only one of this whole field of corn that can hold up its head! What a stupid lot they are, to be sure, and how handsome I am among all these lazy-looking stalks!"

The next day the sun shone brightly, but the cornstalk still held up its head, and when night came and the moon shone brightly, the cornstalk began again to talk to itself and comment on its clumsy-looking brothers.

At last one of them heard this bragging talk and asked what it was saying.

"Why, you heavy-looking fellow, if you could hold up your head and see what I do you would not ask."

"What do you see?" asked the brother stalk.

"Why I see the moon, for one thing," said the conceited stalk, "and besides that I see all the stalks around me humping their heads and looking so heavy and clumsy that I have to laugh when I look at them. Why don't you hold up your head and look about, brother?"

Besides that you do not know how tall and straight I am and how handsome I look. I am glad I am not heavy-headed like all my brothers, but am high-headed. My husks float on the breeze and I am so happy I could dance for joy."

"He is saying me until the last, I expect," thought the silly stalk. "I am so tall it will take two men to carry me, while he is cutting and throwing my stupid brothers on the ground."

But what was the tall stalk's surprise when the farmer and his men came to the field and the tall stalk laughed to himself as he thought of the sights he was to see, now that the farmer was to gather in the stalks.

"He is saying me until the last, I expect," thought the silly stalk. "I am so tall it will take two men to carry me, while he is cutting and throwing my stupid brothers on the ground."

But what was the tall stalk's surprise when the farmer and his men went away and left him still standing, and the wind blew so hard that night that over he went on the ground.

"Oh! here you all are," he said to his brother stalks, "the farmer threw you all on the ground, I see. You are

The Civil Service Board took complete testimony in the case once, and then was unable to give a decision owing to the fact that John F.
