"I do not think there is any danger of the war being ended before the United States has an opportunity to get in and do her share," he said with a smile. "I think, moreover, that we shall have to go in, and go in with all our might. "There's a great deal that ought to be said," he added, "about universal service for the United States." Dr. Matson is not at all peasimistic in regard to the successful outcome of the war for the allies, in the end. He served in the British army for 10 months as a ligutenant on the staff of Colonel Sir Almroth Wright, and in
