George Wright, Here to See Tennis Play, Recalls Interesting History.

SHORTSTOP PLAYED IN '69

Father of Beals C. Wright Was Instrumental in Starting Professional Baseball-Golf and Tennis Held Best.

Portland had the honor of having Beals C. Wright and his father, George C. Wright, attend the boys' and junior singles tennis tournament at the Irvington Club last week. Beals C. Wright acted as referee and needed no introductions, as he is ranked as one of the greatest tennis players in with great interest. He thinks that with great interest. He thinks that tennis and golf are the best games out. This may sound strange from Mr. Wright, who, with the late A. G. Spaidling, started professional baseball in this country and played with the Cincinnati Red Sox in 1869.

American Sport Recalled.
Listening to the talk of Mr. Wright is like hearing the voice of the history of American sport.
In 1890 Mr. Wright and half a dozen enthusiasts astonished the city fathers of Boston by asking their permission to golf on Franklin Park. The municipal authorities were completely mystifled as to what it was all about, but grudgingly granted the request, with the result that a year later the neighboring Brooklyn Country Club adonted the same.

adopted the game.
In 1869 the Cincinnati Red Sox invaded California to astonish the local teams with their wizardry. They were not only the first team to visit the Pacific Coast, but were the first base ball players to sign a contract and asknowledge their professionalism to the world. The golfer of today was the shortstop of "69" and remembers everything as if it were yesterday. The team that represented San Francisco were "the Farsler" they were cisco were "the Engles"—they were birds in those days—but if Mr. Wright's memory is not playing tricks with him, they were not brilliant. He says that the second-rate player had a poor chance of escaping notice in that exciting period as there were no mitted. acting period, as there were no mitts.

Baseball Played Ten Years. The Cincinnatis were not defeated for two seasons, a record that the old shortstop believes has not been equaled shortstop believes has not been equaled shortstop believes has not been equaled since. They were eventually van-quished by a New York team, the "Atlantics." The spoiled record was taken so seriously to heart that the team broke up at the end of the season, and Mr. Wright and several other players migrated to the Boston Red Sox. They at once assisted in winning another championship.

Wright played first-class basebail ten years, until 1879, when he waved an adicu to the diamond as playing manager of the pennant-winning Providence team.

A report sent to the commerce committee by the Secretary of War explains how the misunderstanding crept into official records. The 1915 and 1916 re-

Tennis began to grow popular in the early '80s and about that time the National organisation was founded. Mr. Wright enjoyed playing, but could not repeat the success that had been his sent to the Senate committee seeks to at baseball. He, however, determined at baseball. He, however, determined that his sons should be champions, and had a court laid out near his home at based. The report, in part, says:

this head of a great sporting goods house thinks that more people are now playing golf than any other game. He justifies this statement by pointing out that thousands of elderly men who frequent the links do not indulge in any other sport.

Tennis he deems far more difficult than golf. There are many golf champione, and Oulmet climbed to the top of the ladder in three years. No tennis champion was ever made in less than eight to ten years, and they may be numbered on the fingers on one hand. After a delightful drive over the Columbia River Highway yesterday, George Wright left for the East and Beals C. Wright went back to his apple farm at North Yakima.
