WASHINGTON, Oct. 18.—(Special.)—
Japanese ocean traffic rates on the Pacific are scheduled for a considerable reduction. The present high rates have been putting enormous war profits into the treasuries of the Japanese gene. stated, if Japan desires to hold her silk market in the United States.

While the supply of silk in this country has dwindled now there is barely enough to keep American mills operating, great quantities of silk have accumulated on the docks at Yokohama and Tokio waiting shipment to this country. Current cargo rates on the Pacific, however, have been so high that Japanese silk producers have not been able to ship their product to that Japanese silk producers have not been able to ship their product to American markets on terms that would permit a fair profit. Since the United States is practically the only remaining silk market open to Japan, the seriousness of the situation is obvious. An attempt on the part of the Japanese shipping interests to move the silk to the United States by giving Japanese producers preferential ocean rates has already been blocked, it is competently stated. The Japanese government, which virtually controls Japanese tonnage and is a heavy participant in the war profits it has been earning, has been informed that under the trading with the enemy act passed by the last Congress the President has the power to embargo imports. Silk, it has been pointed out, is not an essential raw material at present, and the power to embargo imports. Silk, it has been pointed out, is not an essential raw material at present, and the United States can afford to do without it during the war period.

The result will be a general reduction of problitive energy rates on the Da.
