pieces of charcoal (about as big as a walnut) to make a top layer, then put on a closely-fitting lid and seal the crock with a strip of cloth dipped in paraffine or with adhesive plaster. Store in a cool cellar. Do not use too large a crock, so that you will not have enough to spoil before it is used when you open it. The butter must be very firmly packed, leaving no air spaces. Some housewives add one-third tea-spoon soda to every two or three pounds of butter when resalting it for packing. Another old-fashioned plan suitable for a less good quality of butter is to clarify it by simmering it slowly for several hours in an iron kettle. This will sometimes (but not always) re-move a "strong" flavor. When all the water has boiled away and the sedi-ment at the bottom is just browning, it is cooled slightly, strained through a double cloth, and put up in jars. Butter claified in this way, how-ever, has a granular consistency that fired told me last Winter that she had succeeded in "merging" claified but-ter of this kind with warm milk (using an egy beater), and that when thor-oughly chilled the merged butter had a tayture suitable for table use. texture suitable for table use. BAKER, Or., July 18.-(Special.)-The unusual task of escorting a boot legger to a revivial meeting so upset City Policeman Jack Henninger last evening that he was the innocent cause of a disturbance which so tickled the risibilities of those present that the response to the request of the preacher to join in song was by no means unani-mous and giggles arose above the sound of the music for several mothe
