All of these effectives are either volunteers or draftees in class 1 As young men reach the age of 21 they will be added to the number, but they will not supply enough effectives to keep the ranks full, and, if an inase in the Army should become necessary, it must draw on class 2 or must comb out effectives from that and the other classes. From these sources the Army may easily be able to gather in ten million men without soing below the two first divisions of class c. By comparison with what the ailles have done, this would be but skimming the cram off the supply of effectives. By so doing we should doubtless draft many men who are doing good service in industry, but we must be prepared more and more to replace such men with others over 45 or with women, sources of energy which we have only bogun to tap. The governing principle should be that the Nation has a right to all the energy of all its citizens, whether their individual circumstances require their individual circumstances require them to work or not. By athering to that principle we can keep the ranks of the Army full and keep our industries in operation.
