How Food Producers of All America Find a Market Here

ERHAPS you have never thought of Armour and Company as a LOCAL concern in this community. Yet, that is exactly what it is-an outlet here to you and your dealers of America's choicest foods. Without this local branch, growers selling through Armour would be without this market. And consumers could not depend upon uniform supplies.

You look upon an Armour plant elsewhere as a local organization there. And the farmers there regard this Branch House (like all Armour's other Branch Houses) as a local business here to sell their foods for them. Both are right-all of the Armour concerns are local institutions-yet so related that they all must operate together to serve you most efficiently.

We could sell to retailers through agents, of course. But then we couldn't deliver under our own supervision and with the scientific care we do now. So we have our own Branch House, and are able to distribute the best foods in the best way, locally.

As a local concern our interests are intensely local. We pay local taxes, employ local men and patronize local institutions. The continued development of this community is vital to us. For we prosper only as this community prospers.

It is to my interest as an individual and to the interest of my firm to see that our service reaches the top in efficiency. For thus we serve best both producers and consumers, and help properly to distribute the nation's food supply under war conditions as in times of peace. This is why Armour and Company maintain a local Branch House and is virtually a local concern.
