mainly one of sentiment, although a gain in actual transactions has also come in those lines where price reductions have been sufficiently drastic to awaken buyers' interest, and there is more rangible reason is anticipate economic revival as market deflation continues. That trade recovery is gradual and checkered, with no sign of it even now in various branches, is not unnatural, comsidering the uncertainties of the period, and buying almost wholly for immediate necessities has been witnessed. While a slowing down has occurred since the inauguration of peace time readjustments, the least satisfactory nows is still that which comes from larger industrial centers, where development of civilian orders has fallen far short of filling the gap left by suspension of war activities and where multiplying unemployment of machinery and labor has resulted.
