before the Brandenburg gate is the best viewpoint for a retrospect upon his life. A cripple, his left arm almost lifeless and quite unusable, he cannot dress or undress alone. He must employ an instrument combining a knife and fork to eat. Further, from his youth a bad ear aliment has troubled him. This misfortune he conceals as if it were a disgrace. In his opinion a prince, king or kaiser must show no weakness. It would shake the faith in the divine right of rulership.

how he raged and trembled through the war between illusions of triumph and fear of the near abyss. The kaiser is not the instigator of war, but from the fear to secure himself and his crown against danger, he did invent the fatal lie about the "war was forced upon the German people by the London surprise attack after a long conspiracy," an unforgivable lie which has driven even honest men and gentle women to the belief that in self-preservation against such treachery everything was permissible, no law or custom binding, the worst atrocity hardly atrocious enough.

Untruthfulness, the atricality, insolent greed for sensuous experiences are the only misferture. experiences are the only misfortunes that could be harvested from such seed.

Perhaps the result would not have been so terrible had the Kaiser Fried-rich lived and bridled his son to modesty. His death left a dangerous gap through which soon blew an evil wind—a hasty breath of eagerness for show, pomp, effect, applause. While his father was on his deathbed the Crown Prince William lets himself be acclaimed on the streets as the leader ## troops, and against all the traditions of the Hohenzollern house advertises himself, his speeches padded thick with phrases even about his children
