HOW many ball games are decided in the grandstand? I mean what part does the rooting of fans play in the result of many games. Concerted rooting usually narrows itself into a battle between the fans and the pitcher...

PLAYERS, pitchers, umpires, will insist they pay no attention to what is being said to them. Players are human, although every now and then some fans don't seem to think so. Hence it is natural that in many cases concerted rooting by fans will have a bad effect. On recruit pitchers it has a similar effect.

Undoubtedly some players pay more attention to the attitude of the crowd than others. It would be possible to cite a dozen cases of major league players who failed in one city, only to be regarded as stars in another.

Because the attitude of the fans was different. I know one major league pitcher in a western city who used to shudder every time his manager notified him he would work. The pitcher was game enough, but fans of that city had taken a dislike to him and were not backward about showing it. Often, before the pitcher would throw a ball in the game, hundreds of fans would be yelling to take him out. If he started by passing a man or being hit safely, it seemed as if everyone in the park was demanding that he be derailed.

In another case a pitcher failed with one of the eastern clubs in the American league, only to develop into a star for a western club. Most pitchers better on a diet of applause far better than abuse.

Some pitchers I have met I believe were indifferent to the attitude of the crowd. In the American league I think of the Chief Bender, in the National league Christy Mathewson. These two remarkable pitchers have, more or less, passed out of the highlight as regular performers and in their passing the game suffered a great loss.

Ninety out of every hundred players are considerably influenced by what is said to them and about them. Nine others are momentarily affected, but soon shake off the sting of criticism of fans or adverse comment of the press.

There has been so much talk of this and misapprehension on this subject that few players who have not given it special thought can tell exactly what their ideas on the subject are. All through the books that have been written on golf there are constant references to the left hand as the one that must take charge of the stroke.

This notion of advancing the left hand into unnatural leadership has, in a more or less confused form, been advanced in all of the books on golf. The only man to face the question and to clear it away as a question on golf there are constant references to the left hand as the one that must take charge of the stroke.

WHAT headline, "Congress Splits Over Beer," would make it appear that our staid lawmakers back in Washington, D. C., are addicted to the vice practice.

Germany never would pay a debt of gratitude. Now she seems quite unwilling to pay the larger debt for insubordination that she owes the world.

Germany continues to be a holdout on the league of nations. Were Germany wise, which she never was, she would know the fate of the ball players who hold out on baseball clubs, and that even of the barboys who hold out on
