POSTMASTER ACCUSED OF RANK INJUSTICE

Discrimination Against Service Men Charged.

VETERANS' IRE IS AROUSED

Statement of Committee Now Investigating Alleged Wrongs to Be Forwarded to Capital.

Sweeping charges of unjust dis-

Sweeping charges of unjust discrimination on the part of Postmaster Myers against employes of the Portland postoffice who entered the country's military service during the recent war, probably will be forwarded within the next few weeks to President Wilson and congress by Scout Young camp, Spanish war veterans.

Although the veterans committee which has been investigating these charges against the Portland postmuster has not yet completed its work, it was learned last night that the committee has procured information which it expects to use in asking for presidential and congressional action towards removing the postmaster from wards removing the postmaster from

It was learned that the committee has received a mass of evidence, both oral and in the form of affidavits, to substantiate the charges of unfair treatment which returned soldiers have made against Postmaster Myers. The committee is now at work sifting the evidence, and in the direct charges to be sent to President Wilson here will be nothing that cannot be proved, de-clared members of the committee.

Old Job Reported Denied. One new indictment against the Portland postmaster which has aroused the ire of the committee now investigating it, is that of a former employe who served in the spruce division, and who, upon final discharge from the army, was refused his old job at the post office.

The postmaster is alleged, in evidence told the before the committee, to have told the spruce division man that he was not entitled to his job because he did not serve in the army. This particular employe, it is said, was drafted into the army as a limited service man. Although anxious to go overseas he was compelled by the war department to remain at home and serve the country a member of the spruce division

Another charge under investigation is that of a postal employe who sought to enlist in the army during the early months of the war. He told the commonths of the war. He told the committee that he went to Postmaster Myers on a number of occasions, but each time the postmaster told him he could not be spared. When the man finally included upon being permitted to enlist. Mr. Myers is said to have instructed him to wait until after the pending Christmas holiday rush.

Employe Finally Entists. Employe Finally Enligis.

The soldier said he waited until after the first of the year and then enlisted without saying anything further to the postmaster. When, a few days before he was to leave Portland for an eastern cantonment, the soldier, according to his story, went to the postmaster and announced that he had enlisted and asked that he be relieved of days. He declares the postmaster then became angry and dismissed him from the postoffice service. It is said that it was necessary for friends to interced at Washington, D. C. before the postmaster was given official instructions to relieve the employe from duty at the postoffice in order that his right to return to the postal service after the war might not be jeopardized. This particular accusation is another of the many new ones which the vets for three postmaster was given of the postal service after the war might not be jeopardized. The origin of the fire is not known. The loss will be about $10,000. He declares the postmaster then be Turning to commercial aviation, the mission emphasized the necessity of the United States conserving the aircraft industry built up during the war.

"America's (aircraft) production industry," the report asserts, "reached large proportions during the war, but since the signing of the armistice it has shrunk to a very small volume. Unless immediate attention is given to its conservation it will practically disappear and a considerable portion of the great sum expended in its development will have been spent fruitlessly."

"No sensible business man," the report adds, "is justified in keeping money invested in the aircraft industry under the conditions which have been maintained in the United States since November 11."
