it descends outside the line.

Looping also results from a number of other ways and it is well for the player to know them. the player to know them. It some-times comes when one forces a shot and the man who takes but a half stroke is particularly susceptible to the fault. Every golfer knows that theoretically and practically, so far as theoretically and practically, so far as possible, the ascending and descending strokes should describe the same line. Now, then, the player should carry the imaginary line out into the air by the upstroke in mind and always start the club hitting into that identical line. It is pretty nearly impossible to make the downstroke correctly if the upstroke is wrong. Many players who loop do not make the ball turn to the right complete enough At the top of the backstroke the At the top of the backstroke the shoulders should be at right angles to the first position.
