LAW VS. FORCE.

The case of the people of the United States against the striking coal miners is to be submitted to the final test of physical endurance and rights of physical force.

It is high time to ascertain who is running the United States and whose interests are paramount—the strikers or the people.

The demands of the miners are as unreasonable and impossible as their methods are bold and indefensible.

Perhaps the secret of the rogue of Ella Wheeler Wilcox in a day or two is revealed in her autobiography.

It is well to remind officers of the law and to inform agitators generally that this statute exists.

The first result of concessions to such extraordinary demands would be an enormous decrease in production.

There is a necessary corollary to any demand for higher wages, and it is that an equivalent in work shall be rendered.

will follow other major industries, including the railroads.

The public views the coal strike with uneasy apprehension, but without purpose to yield under coercion.

It is not settled, but it is needless to say that the right of the miners to a good wage and comfortable living conditions is conceded.

Those Who Come and Go.

"With the modern methods now employed, and a premium paid for each ton of coal, it is not surprising that the traffic regulation regarding right of way at street intersections should be more explicit.
