but since that tip was received until the governor made his statement in The Oregonian yesterday, there was no inkling of the reason. . In some quarters the supposition was advanced that the governor changed his mind about the special session for ratification of the equal suffrage amendment, and used the compensation commission as a camouflage. At any rate, the women who have been urging and demanding that a special session be called were perfectly de-lighted at the news. They consider victory.

There is no means of knowing how long the extraordinary session will hold. Once the members get the ma-chinery in motion they are always loath to stop and go home. The suggested legislation outlined in the governor's statement would consume at least three days, and it is possible that an assortment of new measures may be introduced and fought for so that the session may be prolonged a

Houses Must Organize.

One matter which is causing mem-bers to do a bit of debating is the senate and house organizations. When the regular session adjourned it adjourned sine die. That ended the session and ended the functions the session and ended the functions of the officers, it is contended. In other words, if the members want to be technical, they will have to pass resolutions permitting the officers of the regular session to function at the special session, or else elect a new president of the senate and new speaker of the house, and new staffs for each branch of the legislature. However, for the few days the session will be operating no one will care to start a fight for speaker or president.

If the session is more than a few days, there may be some irrigation legislation pro-posed, and it is quite possible that the legislature will reached the Horne bill, which organized labor was so interested in passing last February. There is some talk of the legisla-ture restoring the death penalty but There is some talk of the legislature restoring the death penalty, but this is beyond the province of the legislature. Capital punishment was killed by the people through a constitutional amendment, and it will require a constitutional amendment to restore the penalty. The most the legislature can do at a special session would be to refer the matter to the people, and this would put the the people, and this would put the subject on the ballot without the trouble and expense of circulating an initiative petition.

If the request is granted by the leg-islature during the special session it will not be necessary for Mayor Baker and other friends of the measure to circulate petitions throughout the state to place the measure on the bailot.

Mayor Baker yesterday received an opinion from City Attorney LaRoche in which he held that under the provisions of the constitution the legislative assembly is empowered to refer initiative measures to the people at a special election ordered by the assembly.

Mayor Baker is anxious to have the constitutional amendment restoring capital punishment referred to the people at the earliest possible moment. Senator Charles Thomas of Jackson country, who was in the city yesterday, said something should be done at the special session about creating the office of lieutenant-governor, albeit the people snowed under the bill to create such an office at the special election last spring.

While it is too early to forecast the character of legislation coming up, it is a foregone conclision that there will be a few dozen bills presented. The witness said he had never seen Lucas until he came into his office following the launching of the Tele-gram campaign against him.

Chief discussion among politicians yesterday was the special session of the legislature, which the governor is to call January 12. The members of the Multnomah delegation were especially interested and there was considerable speculation as to the reason for the call. It appeared to be the opinion of many that the need for giving assistance to the workmen's compensation commission was not the real motive for the call.

It was predicted in political circles as week ago that a special session was to be called. One member of the Multnomah delegation was told that he could "bet everything" that such a he could "bet everything" that such a call would be made by the governor, and the could be made by the governor.
