Not the violent death fancied by those to whom a Bolshevik is primarily a murderer, but the intangible, inexorable death that goes with prolonged only one day a week. The rest of the suffering and privation. One sees it time the temperature was about one orable death that goes with prolonged in the dead-white faces of the people, degree higher than outside, or about in their lack-luster eyes, emaciated ten degrees Fahrenheit. I wore two bodies, slow, stumbling galt. It seems suits of heavy underwear, two pairs to gaze down upon one from the un-painted facades and unwashed win-dows of the houses. It clutches one's throat when a skinny horse loses its footing, falls and does not rise again. or when one passes the carcass of a and cap.

People Endure Agony.

I exaggerate, of course. But to drive home the picture of Moscow as I saw it a certain amount of exaggeration is necessary. This I say flat-ly without exaggeration: Of all the suffering I have witnessed throughout the war on the battlefields, among pitiful refugees of France and Bel-gium, and in starving, beaten Gergium, and in starving, beaten Germany, none even approaches the agony endured through months and years by many millions of the Russian people.

than sees in Moscow's thoroughfares is chiefly due, I believe, to a rather peculiar factor. Successive Russian governments, the Soviets more than any other, have plastered the walls of buildings all over the city with all sorts of posters, placards and builtins.

TO GRIP RUSSIA

A surprising number of shops were open, considering the tales that have been told about all commerce having been wiped out. Most of them were soviet stores, to patronize which a prospective purchaser must have a card or special order.

The private shops are all of the smaller variety, selling such wares as drugs, groceries, leather goods, millinery, perfumery, books, objects d'art and knick-knacks. At night all save the principal squares and thoroughfares are unlighted, but nevertheless they are thronged with pedestrians until after midnight. Indeed, between 11 and 12 they are more crowded than at most hours of the day, because of home going theatergoers.

There are far more theaters open and playing to full houses than there were in peace times. Doubtless the very strain of conditions under which they live drives Moscovites to seek temporary forgetfulness in the playhouses, as humanity always does in a stressful period.

thousand roubles our 20-minute drive from the station to the commissariat of foreign affairs cost us. As we still lets, concerts, both vocal and symphonic, and even a dance hall or two.

To a dollar, this meant $30.

There are motion picture shows too, all Sovietski (nationalized) like the theaters and producing some mighty good films; grand opera ballets, concerts, both vocal and symphonic, and even a dance hall or two.

From the station we repaired, as I Officially the caar rouble is worth no more than the soviet rouble. One must find a clandestine money changer to obtain a more advantageous exchange.

One's first reaction to Moscow is confused. The city looks better and worse than one had pictured it. One has a momentary thrill at finding the street full of people, with sleighs and confused. This is a full and faithful record of all the food we drew from Soviet sources at the Maly Haritonevski house. And being foreigners, and therefore objects of Russian hospitality, we were living on the fat of the land. Only the red soldiers and possibly the people's commissaries at the Kremlin fared better than we.
