The Germans under allied rule appear no better and no worse off than the Germans elsewhere in western Germany. France believes she has been badly "let down" by both Britain and America. That is why she has turned again to her policy for the "left bank," already clearly formulated in a secret agreement with Russia made in 1916. Informed Frenchmen put it this way to the correspondent in Paris a few days ago:

Guarrel Held Eternel

Quarrel Held Eternal.

"Our quarrel with Germany is eternal, but never again shall we be the aggressors. We ask security alone, but security we must have: we are not likely next time to be so lucky as at the Marne: we may not have so much outside support. The Rhine is our natural military frontier. We asked for it at the peace conference; we were told the league of nations would protect us; that such material guaranties were out of date. We acquiesced, but asked that the league be provided with an international army, and were told American and British opinion would never agree.
