With the batsman goes to first base, to which he is entitled under the rules; but what about the base runner on third who seemed certain to score. The rules say he must go back to third, as no runners can advance unless forced to make room for the batsman. In the last five years I have seen a wise catcher pull such a play half a dozen times, greatly to his benefit. Thus in a way the rules place a premium on the catcher's interferes.

play, although neither adhered to the strict interpretation of the rule. It was decided that whenever the catcher interferes, the batsman should have interferes, the batsman should have the right to go to first base, while all runners should be entitled to advance a base, whather forced or not. Such a ruling seemed to have removed any premium for the catcher to interfere. Yet all major league umplies do not agree on such an interpretation. One veteran arbitrator claims a wise batter can purposely stick his bat into the catcher and create an interference. However, I have always believed an umpire ought to be able to differentiate between a catcher's interference and a premeditated interference by the batter. All that would be necessary in such a case would be to call the runner coming from third out, if there were less than two men out, when the batsman attempted such rough-house strategy.
