On superficial observation it may been that Johnson should be content with any declaration which is not an outright repudiation of his neleague attitude, for no one now assumes that it is a no-league convention. It will not be, unless Johnson, by some masterly political maneuver, makes it so. We may give Johnson credit for good faith and the courage of his convictions in his demand for of his convictions in his demand for an honest platform without dismiss-ing the likely guess that he sees in straight-out opposition to the league his one best chance to win. For in that event his nomination would be a logical consequence.

The senate majority would thus, of course, find itself in eclipse, and the senate bosses who have devised the grand project of having the convention indorse all the republican senators, whether for or against the league, will have made all their fine plans for nothing.

Wood and Johnson seemed to be going direct to a head-on collision, and, after the wreck should have been cleared away, there would be provided an open track for the next available candidate. Why not Lowden, who had discreetly steered his course to avoid needless animosities from the followers of his competitors? But the developments of the senatorial inquiry into campaign expenditures have been hurtful to Lowden.
