WILLIE AND EUGENE HOWARD, BROTHERS, NOT MUCH ALIKE

One Is Highly Artistic and Loves Painting, While Other Has Only the One Ambition to Have a Good Time.

BY LEON CASS BAIR.
HEN Hamlet told Horatio that there were more things in heaven and earth than were dreamed of in the latter's philosophy, he must have been thinking of how Willie and Eugene Howard employ their leisure moments on local beaches. Eugene is a painter and dabbles in oils and water colors, occasionally dashing off a poster in crayon to bestow on some member of the company, or some stage employe. A handy, compact traveling palette and brushes occupies one corner of his dressing table and between acts he adds the colors to sketches he has made of some picture spot along his travels. Just now he is doing a series of idealized heads, and says his next venture may be a study of Willie.

Willie and Eugene Howard.

That scuffer says there is no money in painting, unless one paints something big, like houses or barns or fences, but Eugene says he isn't doing it for money. "He is expressing his soul in art," snickered Willie, and Eugene threatened to make his brother eat a tube of paint if he didn't let up. Willie subsided, but only temporarily. He is incorrigible in his tanning and not to be taken seriously. Willie says he isn't to be taken at all, seriously or otherwise. That's why he's going to Atlantic City and live on the board walk and in the water. Eugene, who is a doer, and purpose personified and hasn't taken a vacation in eight years, because he's been working or writing, is going to take a vacation in July or August. His wife is an English girl, who retired from the stage when she married Eugene a dozen years ago, and her people live in Birmingham in England. This summer Eugene plans to combine his visit to England with a business venture. He is going into the play-producing game. While he is gone he is going to purchase none.
