More Truth Than Poetry. By James J. Montague.

The poets sing of noble toil,
They have a feigned affection
For raking hay or tilling soil, But though I mean to do no wrong To my poetic brothers, notice that they stick to song

The poets sing of breaking waves That dash a ship to pieces, While sailors land in watery graves Before the tumult cear I would not, as I said before Be counted with the railers, But still the poets stay ashore And leave the wrecks to sailors.

The poets sing the joys of strife, Of battling every minute With the distress and care of life, To win a fortune in it. And though from any brother bard never saw one striving hard. Except at writing vers

And yet were I a poet too.

And not a versifier, And I could make men strive to do To yearn and to aspire, And get well paid for what I wrote, I scarcely need to mention, That to such lyrics I'd devote My time and my attention! Playing Safe.

Women Watchmen Guard the Nation's Timber Wealth

Stationed on craggy pinnacles that lift above the ranges and the broad expanse of forest are women whose duty it is to protect the timber wealth of the northwest from devastation by flame. They are the outposts of the forest service, and the faintest curl of smoke, where some incipient blaze is eating its way into the undergrowth, is caught by their clear eyes, as keen as the vision of the great white-headed eagles that make their homes in the same lofty vicinage. De Witt Harry, in the Sunday issue, tells a vividly interesting story of these women watchmen. Illustrated.

To Paris; for a Divorce and a New Gown-To the feminine fancy Paris has always been the delectable land, a province of delight, where the shops show superlative garments, and where the splendor of the sex reveals itself in attire to shame the bird of paradise. And Paris is today more than ever the vogue among the fair matrons of the smart set. It is there that clement French courts make divorce an easily obtainable commodity, and it is there that the latest triumphs in gowns are to be purchased with the fat plunder of alimony. Hence, my dears, forward to Paris the gay! Nina Carter Marbourg, writing in the Sunday issue, declares this condition

John B. Payne, Superintendent of the United States-Secretary of the interior is he, in President Wilson's cabinet, and all the resources of the country; the vastitude of forest and mineral, are in his keeping. In the Sunday issue, with photographs, there is an excellent sketch of Mr. Payne, with an exclusive interview on the policy and undertakings of the department of the interior. It is instructive and entertaining, and to read it is to possess a clearer comprehension of the capabilities of the nation. In the Sunday magazine section, Demoness of the Tennis Courts-That is what English tennis enthusiasts have named Elizabeth Colyer, the 17-year-old girl whose amazing aptitude at the game has become the talk of European experts. Tennis is to this lassic as natural an element as air to the lark, and her grace and uncanny precision have bested every opponent-and they were notables-who has been matched with her. Told in the Sunday magazine section.

Salvation Army Bride-Where is it that the divorce evil has not reared its horrid front? In the ranks of the Salvation Army, of course. Statistics compiled by high officials of the organization demonstrate that the Salvation Army lassie marries to stay married, and that "until death do us part" is no idle pledge when she subscribes to it. Helen Hoffman writes on this subject in the Sunday issue.

Little America Close by Jerusalem-A singular story is this, of the colony of American men and women who have for 40 years held their lonely outpost near the walls of the ancient city. What their work is, and what they have accomplished through faith and courage, is told in the Sunday magazine section by James Morgan. Illustrated.
