Figures Are Blacklisted. "Those figures compiled by an expert, the peer of any railroad statistician," said Mr. Mansfield, "and were read to the business men who agreed that, should they be published, they would startle the country, as showing hitherto suppressed figures. One man, who said he was personal friend of George Horace Lorimer, editor of the Saturday Evening Post, said he would guarantee that publication would print the facts. Another said that Colliers' had published them. It later developed that both of these editors said they didn't want anything to do with the figures."

Growers Have to Pay. "In other words," said Mr. Mansfield, "they said to the government on the one hand, 'We'll give you $500,000,000,' and then turned around and said to investors, 'Look how prosperous we are.' The point is, the growers of the country have to pay the bill in very large part. That kind of business has got to be changed. How much constructive suggestion? Do you presume we got from the federal reserve board when we asked for their help? They told us to 'hush up,' that the country was passing through a period of deflation and that we must be content to save our losses with others. The chairman of the board said to me: 'I challenge you to mention a single industry that has not suffered enormous losses this year.' I replied: 'I'll name the bankers; I don't think they lost anything, did they?' I understand that the reserve bank of New York earned more than 300 per cent on investments in 1920."

Mr. Mansfield concluded his statement by saying that he was not a pessimist, but that he was a realist. He said that the country was in a state of financial crisis, and that the only way to get out of it was by a radical change in the present policy. He said that the government was the only power that could bring about such a change, and that it was the duty of the people to demand it.
