Symphony Programme Includes Saint-Saens.

Four of Dances From "Henry VIII" to Be Played.

BY CAVERLY BEAUMONT.

Article No. 11. I him in the front rank of living French composers, and though he adheres largely to the classical style in music, yet he is at times romantic. Not despising modern means of musical expression, Saint-Saens is a master of orchestration to its least deof his operas, the most popular is "Samson and Delliah," with its hib-lical setting.

The subject of his opera "Henry VIII." opened up new fields to Saint-Saens, and afforded him a local color that influenced his music. The airs impress us as thoroughly English, and the suite of dances which he introduced are as distinctly Scotch, and a duced are as distinctly Scotch, and a welcome contrast to the somewhat gloomy topic of the story. Of the six dances of this suite, the

Of the six dances of this suite, the Portland Symphony orchestra will play four, and in the opening number you will instantly recognize "The Entrance of the Clans" as they come from hamlet and hillside, to the appointed spot, marching to the sound of bagpipe and pibroch.

In the "Idyll" which follows we of baggipe and pibroch,

In the "Idyll" which follows we are transported to the land of "the bonnie purple heather." with its missty hills and mossy glens, and hear the call of the shepherd as he winds his way over the moorkand.

What a day of merrymaking we witness in the third movement when the glosy delights the assembled clans with her gay bolero. They enjoy the dance of the gipsy so much that they cannot resist following her example, and every one has a wonderfel time in the final "gigne," and as we hear the merry music, our own feet can scarcely keep from joining in as this jolly Scotch air whirls ever faster and faster.

Portland Street Names

M EN well informed in the history and the early citizenry of Portland are unable to recall the man for whom T street was renamed and the doubt which now exists regarding the name of Thurman street blds well to be permanent. The scheme was to rename those streets lettered in alpha-betical order after ploneers and men who had played some part in developing the city.

There is, no doubt, someone who remembers the Thurman for whom remembers the Thurman for whem the street was named, or perhaps some written record of his life, but those who have made a point of familiarizing themselves with the city's history are not aware of its existence. The old city directories in the library of the Oregon Historical society throw little light on the name. The first directory, published in 1863, has a Nathan Thurman running a saloon a Nathan Thurman, running a saloon at 8 Taylor street, but in 1864 he had taken another occupation, so it is not likely that he had endeared himself through contributions to the conviviality of the community as a saloonkeeper to any extent that would warrant the honor of naming a street after him 30 years later. It is probable that Nathan Thurman died in 1868 as his name is dropped from the city directory the following from the city directory the following year. His wife, Cynthia Ann, and two sons, Ed. a printer, and G. W. Thurman, a telegraph operator, appear in the directory in 1872. The widow died in 1875 and Ed Thurman left the city in 1876. His brother remained in the city until 1885, when with his danshers. We have the city with the directory that the city until 1885, when with his daughter Kate, he disapwith his daughter Kate, he disappeared and is known to have gone to California. Other men bearing the name of Thurman appeared during the '80s hut remained only a year or two, This, so far as printed records are concerned, is the history of the name of Thurman in the annels of the city. Whether the street name honors the family is not known.
