What the great Chef Says
About Cooking Electrically

Emile Bailly of the St. Regis Hotel has no peer as a chef. You will be interested in the following convincing statement from unquestioned authority. Chief Bailly says:

"I prefer roasting and baking by electricity because the oven has an evenly distributed heat which, under the switches and controls, can be quickly turned from intense heat to a very mild heat. In this way, when you put your roast in, the surface is evenly and quickly seared so that the juices in the meat or bird or other viand are retained. Not only that, but you do not have to prevent it from being overbrowned or overcooked at any one point. You just let it remain, simply waiting to see that the cooking process has been completed. This electric range helps to make St. Regis cooking distinctive in quality and flavor."

The reason why electrically cooked food has such a superior flavor is because the food does not come in contact with gases caused by combustion, and one of the most important considerations is the fact that meats shrink very much less. For instance: If a 10 lb. roast of beef is put into an ordinary oven there is only 7 lbs. left when it is roasted, 30% at least of the roast having been consumed, whereas, the shrinkage in an electric oven is only 10%.

This shrinkage is composed of juices or the nutriment of the meat, and if it was all consumed in the cooking there would be nothing left but a hard, pulpy substance with no nutriment in it.
