In a moment of crushing defeat they suddenly turned from a monarchist to a republican form of government, and are still about evenly divided in opinion between the two. The re-publicans rule in form but only to a limited degree in fact, for the monarchists obey only so far as they choose, and the republicans are not strong enough to compel obedience. The republicans try to fulfil treaty obligation to pay reparations and to disarm, but are naturally reluctant, and the monarchists evade disarmament in all manner of ways, and force upon the government expendi-tures but successfully oppose taxes necessary to meet them. All that is tions is done under pressure from without, in fear of further military occupation. In order to be effective, this pres sure from the allies should be constant in pursuance of a consistent, practicable policy upon which they are united. But they are not united. France, burning with a just sense of intolerable wrong, insists that reparations be paid, and, in fear of new invasion, demands that the disarmament clauses be observed to the letter, for France is determined to hold Germany down. Great Britain vive the great trade it formerly had with Germany, therefore wants to lift Germany up. Italy also has no further cause for fear, but wants to evive Germany, both as a market and as a source of capital for Italian worked at cross purposes, and by so doing have tempted Germany to travel the road to ruln by encouraging belief that they can not agree or

There is one law which certainly is of far greater importance than either the 1925 fair or highway legislation the 1925 fair or highway legislation and that is a law amending the present law governing the transportation of high school students from one school district to another. School districts having no high schools have been paying for the transportation of students to adjoining districts which have high schools. The attorney-general of the state has recently ruled that this cannot be done.
