Throughout his speech the chancellor was unusually frank in his criticism of the allies' treatment of the reparations problem, charging that the commission either was unamenable to everyday logic or had persistently neglected to acquaint itself with the actual status of Germany's with the actual status of Germany's economic situation. The reparations decision, accompanied by a note which the chancellor said was couched in a needlessly severe tone, had not only aroused national indignation, but incidentally had added 28,000,-000,000 marks to the German budget in consequence of the unprecedented slump of the mark, which set in auto-matically with the note's arrival. He reminded the allies of their previous assurances that the reparations commission was not entitled to such prerogatives.
