The ing color tone to your dress. The skirt embellishment can be eliminated should you so desire and let your labor confine itself to the blouse and sleeve trim only. The collar of the cherry or cream organdy will be in happy combination and can be easily changed when you become tired of it.

For the gingham there is an O XALIC acid solution will usually remove rust spots from white goods. The material should be stretched on an embroidery hoop over a bowl of hot water. The acid can then be applied to the exact spot with a medicine dropper and is removed by very thorough rins-ing before it has time to attack the fabric.

(2) Unless the angora trimming is easily detached, your best plan would be to send the sweater to a professional cleaner rather than risk spoiling it, as you probably would, in washing it at home.

If the trimming is simply sewn on and can be removed (always a wise plan with white angora on a dark sweater) you can wash each separately in soap jelly or soap flakes and lukewarm water.

Measure both sweater and trimmings very carefully before you begin, so that in drying you can pull and pat them to the cornect size and shape. Give very thorough rinsing in lukewarm water. Do not pass through a wringer or twist, but simthrough a wringer or twist, but simply squeeze well and dry in a hammock made of nettling or of a bath towel, so that the weight of the dripping water does not pull the garment out of shape. Shape carefully when nearly dry.

You might, if you liked, try "dry cleaning" by shaking the garment in a gallon screw-top jar with gasoline—once to clean and once or line—once to clean and once or twice to rinse; but this does not always succeed with white material. This often lacks freshness and looks gray and cloudy after a "gasoline wash."

"gasoline wash."

If you try the latter you will, of course, be careful to avoid any fire or flame in the room. In fact, the cleaning should be done outdoors, and the garment should hang in the air for 24 hours or more to get rid of the unpleasant smell of gasoline. If the black sweater part is not really solled you might find that you could clean the white angora part with one of the commercial cleaning fluids to be purchased at almost any drug store.
