So it looked, indeed, to Elizabeth and Willie, two swarthy small fry from the south end, who paused before it yesterday, as the crowd gathered. To the crowd, stayed by comfortable breakfasts, the loaf was merely a symbol. To the children it was food.

Of course, all this is hard to believe, but you'd understand the story better if you were either of the children, whose father mends old kettles. Door-to-door, storm or sun, trudging up and down the blocks to find a kettle with a hole in it. There are plenty of such kettles on the dump, and lots of them—thrifty mended-down in the old clothes and scrap iron district of Front street. But they are very, very scarce where the tinker travels.
