THE FAMILY LAWYER
by Will Bernard
"Newly Discovered Evidence"

Harry was found guilty of mugging an elderly woman. A few months later he demanded a new trial on grounds of "newly discovered evidence." It seems that although the woman had mentioned feeling raindrops on her face, the records of the Weather Bureau showed no rain on the day of the crime.

Was this enough basis for reopening the case? The court said no, because such an error—by itself—was not serious enough to indicate a miscarriage of justice. Generally speaking, courts are leery of reopening a case that has already been closed. They say it is too costly in both time and money to do so without good reason to think that a second trial will have a different outcome.

Another man was convicted in a morals case after failing to produce any witnesses to support his alibi. Afterward, seeking a new trial, he claimed he did indeed have three alibi witnesses that he had failed to summon.

"I just didn't think I'd need them," he explained.

But the court ruled that since he had known about the three witnesses from the start, he could not call this newly discovered evidence. The court said a defendant cannot keep an "ace in the hole" just in case he loses the first time around.

Of course, if a real injustice is uncovered, a new trial is clearly in order.

In a murder case, years after a man had been convicted and sent to prison, important advances were made in the science of ballistics. Experts, rechecking the fatal bullet, decided that it could not have been fired from the defendant's gun.

This was one of those cases, said the court, where "subsequent developments cast serious doubt on the justice of the conviction"—so the verdict could not stand.
