Ex Post Facto

Public indignation ran high some years ago when children began losing their lives in abandoned refrigerators. Couldn't the owners of those refrigerators be punished for having left them in such hazardous condition?

The answer was no, because until that time there had been no law on the subject. And new laws cannot be applied to actions that have occurred in the past.

This rule against "ex post facto" laws is laid down in Article I of the Constitution. Based on elementary fairness, it applies not only to the creation of new crimes but also to the increasing of punishment for an existing crime.

Harris pulled off a fraudulent land deal. At the time, the prescribed punishment for his offense was two years in prison. But by the time he was caught and brought to trial, the legislature had upped the penalty to four years.

The judge tried to impose a four-year sentence, but a higher court ruled that he could not lawfully do so. The court felt Harris was entitled to know, at the time he committed the fraud, how seriously it was looked upon by society.

However, the rule applies only in the field of criminal law. Civil disabilities may indeed work retroactively. For example:

A new law declared that no one who had ever been convicted of a felony could get a license to practice medicine. A former burglar, hoping to become a doctor, challenged the law as ex post facto. But the court rejected his challenge, saying the new law was not a punishment but merely a means of maintaining high ethical standards in the medical profession.

"If a state may require good character (for) the practice of medicine," said the court, "it may rightfully determine what shall be the evidence of that character."
