Coalition votes to continue

has changed. If you think you have nothing to do, go look. The only thing changed is that a few Black children are back in neighborhood schools. They are still abused in these schools and they are still abused in the schools out there.

"You feel you are not top-dog. They paid more attention to the Black United Front."

Vesia Loving said the Coalition had made recommendations whereas the Front had made demands. "If the Coalition had followed through after its recommendations were rejected, there would have been no need for the Front. You backed down when you should have acted. That's the only reason the Black United Front had to act." She said there is still a purpose for the Coalition.

Rocky Johnson, former director of the Coalition, said since Ronnie Herndon, co-chairman of the Black United Front, had requested the Coalition's assistance and since support for continuation came from Black members, the Coalition should continue. "The clear issue of desegregation is between the School Board and the Black United Front, but there is a long way to go. There still is no plan." Saying he is not clear what role the Coalition should play at this time, he expressed a belief that a bi-racial group could be an influential and necessary voice in the future.

The body voted to retain a nine member executive body which will meet and will call membership meetings as needed; and to offer assistance to the Black United Front and the School Board in moving toward equity in education.
