Establishment fights for survival

Billygate, the movement to dump Carter has actually taken issue with the President on two grounds: electability and competence. Despite his low standing in the polls, the first question ought to have been sufficiently answered by his string of primary successes. The second may be no more than a semantic quibble. The charge that Carter is "out of

Parents meet

August 12th: coffee at the home of Michael Grice - 2923 NE 8th at 7:30 P.M., R.S.V.P. 249-3311.

August 14th: Meeting with parents of new middle school students to discuss the results of the questionnaire sent to registered students as of 7-27-80. Monroe High School (2508 NE Everett) at 7:30 P.M.

August 21st: Coffe at the home of Gwen Thomas - 2931 NE Dunckley. Time: 7:30 P.M. R.S.V.P. 249-3311.

control" in a sense means precisely that he is "out of the club." For it speaks to his inability to come to terms with Washington's entrenched powers, with its congressional moguls, pundits and tenured bureaucrats; with, in other words, the people who can help government work, or undermine it with embarrassing leaks, programmed failures and countervailing loyalties.

This process is nothing new in the Capital. Mark Twain mercilessly lampooned the Washington establishment and its influence-mongering 100 years ago in The Gilded Age. But the Club survived his satiric thrusts as easily as it survived Grover Cleveland's civil service reforms, which were intended to make the bureaucracy more responsive by ending the patronage system, and wound up only making it more deeply entrenched.

By the end of the last century, Washington King makers like Ohio Senator Mark Hanna were the nation's real chief executives. They would have remained so but for the assassin's bullet which put Teddy Roosevelt in the Oval Office. Less than 20 years later, the Club reasserted its power with a vengeance, when Senator Henry Cabot Lodge led the congressional drive to humble an independent-minded Woodrow Wilson.

Afterward came the weakling presidents Harding and Coolidge, and then a nearly continuous stream of more forceful executives, drawn directly from the ranks of the Club.

Salem site of Jazz Festival

Jazz enthusiasts are looking forward to being in Salem on Saturday, August 9-10 for Salem JAZZ'80, the first jazz festival sponsored by the Salem Theater of Performing Arts. A big band, trios, quintets and guest artists will be featured both days.

SALEM JAZZ '80 will be presented from noon to 6:00 p.m., outdoors on the grounds of the Mission Mill Muesum, 260 12th SE, across from Willamette University. Tickets in advance are $10 for both days with the single admission being $7 for each day. tickets are available at Meier & Frank Tickets Statewide. Seating will be on the lawn and everyone is encouraged to bring their own blankets, pillows or folding chairs to enjoy the outstand-

The Club changed in composition and character over those years, growing vastly under Franklin Roosevelt and Lyndon Johnson, and gradually assuming basic allegiance to the concept of the welfare state. But it remained a club, making decisions which affected everyone, based on its own rules and relationships. The campaign against Carter demonstrates its continuing power.

In the dog days of August, near convention time in a political year full of acrimony, some sort of infighting was predictable no matter who sat in the White House. But the seriousness of the dump Carter movement is extraordinary. It has its roots in a pervasive anxiety in Washington over what is perceived to be a general decline of state power around the world, the kind of power that makes Washingtonians important. In the minds of traditional power brokers, Jimmy Carter is associated with that decline.

Along with John Anderson, if for different reasons, he also symbolizes the waning vitality of the two major parties. As president he has been neither in control of, nor controlled by the Democratic Party structure he ostensibly represents.

To the power brokers, moreover, the breakdown of the two-party monopoly on domestic politics is synonymous with the breakdown of a bi-polar global political scheme which has dominated the Washington consciousness since World War II. Decisions and alliances are far more problematic now than they were in the days when Washington and Moscow -- or the Democrats and the G.O.P. -- defined all of the choices that mattered.

Carter has not succeeded in his effort to forge an alternative approach, but he long ago acknowledged that the old solutions to America's problems were unworkable.

Additional performers include: the Jazz Orchestra of Salem with guest conductor Matt Catingub; pianist Bob Lucas; the Mel Brown Trio; Glider; the Mike Vannice Quintet. For additional information contact the Meier & Frank ticket office or Bill Smith, 363-8646.
