Career Corner

by Bernadine Gilpin

You want a job? The employer today is saying "You've got to show me!" Gone are the days when you could sit back and decide which job to take. You have got to get out and do some creative job search.

There are jobs to be had, even in today's economy. You must know how to look, act, write, and talk "job ready." This is more important today than it's ever been. The exceptional candidate is going to get the job. There are things that you can learn so that you will be that exceptional candidate.

As a career counselor, I often hear people come in the office and say, "Man, I really need a job!" Sometimes, my reaction is, "You could sure have fooled me!" I don't say it, but I think it inside. Why? Their appearance says, "I'm defeated." Few employers are going to be drawn to a failure. Their clothes say, "I don't care!" and that's before we even get down to what they can do.

To get a job today, you must project a confident, caring attitude. How can you do that when you are desperate for a job? Fake it till it feels right! We all learn to put on masks from the time we are small. This is one act you want your employer to believe.

You'll be asked, "What can you do?" An employer wants to know what you can do for her or him. If you answer, "Anything," you're liable to get nothing. Be realistic and specific in your statement. Have some answers ready.

Knowing how to fill out a job application, write a resume, dress for the interview, and answer questions are all essential in today's job search. You must look better, act better, be better than the other candidates. These things can be learned.

"Crime Curb Logic Urged"—Oregon lawmakers, corrections officials, and the public are looking for a quick fix for Portland's just-disclosed and unenviable position of having the fourth-highest crime rate among the nation's 50 largest cities. Only Miami, Atlanta, and Oakland have higher rates. Right-leaning conservatives, for example, might clutch at only more police, prisons, stiffer sentences, and a relaxing of constitutional safeguards. Liberals, on the other hand, likely would seek only correction of social ills on the theory that crime, however repressed, can not be successfully dealt with until the social ills that are the cause of most crimes are cured.

In recommending that lawmakers adopt a policy of community-based corrections, education of the public, more minority involvement in the corrections system, minority police officers, etc., in addition to a new prison, the writer recognizes the shortcomings of one-sided cures. Lawmakers desirous of convincing citizens that a new penitentiary is necessary have an obligation to educate constituents, to explain to them what experience with and studies of our present corrections system has shown, and what forces have and are contributing to our crime problem. This strategy assumes—correctly, we believe—that for us to build a new penitentiary while not addressing the cause of our rise in crime would be unacceptable to an enlightened public, who have to bear the consequences of any shallow solution to the crime problem that we now have. Because of ingrained cultural patterns, long existing social policies, a foundering economy, etc., we are now faced with rising crime rates, that are sometimes exaggerated and conveniently used as a scapegoat to cite as the cause for a multitude of problems. "Budget-balancing blend desirable" was the title of a recent (Dec. 4) Oregonian editorial and with just a few minor changes and substitutions the logic and reason used was transposed in the above paragraphs and would seem to aptly fit the situation and understanding that needs to be expressed in regard to the corrections system. But it seems the powers that be, i.e., police officials, judges, prosecutors, politicians, newspaper editors, etc., would rather keep the issue of crime and the corrections system on the low plane of emotionalism, the demagogues playground.

It doesn't take much thought to realize that by the nature of a structure of this society, when you start talking about instituting substantive change in a system as far-reaching and extensive as the corrections system, then you're talking about conflict with entrenched vested interests. No matter how much better it might make things for the overall society, do you think the vested interests would acquiesce to a community's or neighborhood's endeavor to take over part of the function of our courts and penal system? What if, as proposed by some who have studied our corrections and judicial systems, neighborhood or community judicial councils were established to take responsibility for sentencing offenders who were members of that community, and were in charge of overseeing detention facilities located in the community? Those who are now employed in this function would resist with every means at their disposal, including the use of "authoritative" studies and statistics showing that such a proposal would not work.

Of course, such a change would presume a change in the thinking of the community's concerned (and there are strong indications that such a change is taking place), because since we have become a modern, progressive, affluent society, we have been all too eager to pay someone else to hide our dirty linen. Now we are coming to realize that the problem has become too big and too serious to hide and we have to clean it up. The present system is not working—can you disagree with that? Let's not let the demagogues and those with vested interests channel our growing concern and interest into blind support of outdated solutions; we are at the stage now where we can clean our own linen, clean our own backyard, and there are moral and also economic benefits to our doing so. The need is pressing and one force or another is going to be stepping into this vacuum, so let's get at it.
