

North Carolina's James Worthy goes up for two against Georgetown's Eric Smith (32) and Ed Spriggs (50). Worthy, with 28 points, was chosen MVP.

Wow! What a game! Then there was one!

by Al McGilberry

Wow! What a game! It was all we could ask for and more; it was the Super Bowl, Heavyweight Championship fight, World Series, all rolled into one. The finals of the N.C.A.A. Basketball Tournament featuring Georgetown and North Carolina, Georgetown from the upstart Big East Conference and North Carolina from the established A.C.C. Conference going to war at the Superdome in New Orleans. 61,000 people at a college basketball game—can you believe that?

That's how far the college spectacle has come: millions across the country watching on T.V., enjoying every minute on prime time.

The game was a trip into basketball fantasy, nip and tuck all the way. One team up and then the other; neither team giving the other one inch of space. No intimidations, just two greats of the basketball world trying to win the Golden prize.

We had touted Georgetown all year. John Thompson had recruited 7-foot Patrick Ewing from Boston to join his four seniors from the basketball wars. This was all Georgetown needed to get to the finals—a skyscraper in the middle to control the tempo and flow of the game.

North Carolina, a team with great players year in and year out: with a coach known to have one of the greatest minds in the game, going into the season as favorites to win the A.C.C. Dean Smith had James Worthy and Sam Perkins from last year's front line. Only All-American Al Wood was missing. He added a few freshmen to his roster and away the season started.

At season's end North Carolina had two defeats, Georgetown six.

Both teams started the tournament favored to win their regionals and get to the final four. And then there were just two teams left—the way the T.V. executives wanted it. Georgetown and North Carolina for the championship.

The game was spectacular all the way and now it was down to 15 seconds left. Georgetown with the ball; the score 63-62 in North Carolina's favor. Everyone in the country waiting for the ball to be thrown to that big giant so he could throw it down. As the seconds slipped by, the world waited for that special movietime ending. But no! It was not to be. North Carolina's James Worthy had the ball. How did that happen? The game was over—North Carolina won. Long live the King, long live North Carolina, champions of all college ball.

And then there was one—a worthy one at that.

The North Carolina Tarheels ranked number one in the pre-season and ranked number one in the post-season, proved to be just that in conquering the Georgetown Hoyas in a 63-62 thriller. All along this writer felt that the presence of both Sam Perkins and James Worthy would be too much for the awesome freshman Pat Ewing. Worthy showed the world that as a 6-9 junior he's probably the best strong forward, professional or college, playing the game today. Sure the Hoyas were favored by a mere two points, and that's hard to believe when you consider Dean Smith having his best record ever, 32-2 at North Carolina. Also, remembering that his team (NC) had to play in the always tough ACC where a breather is as hard to find as an elusive artisan.

Georgetown, losing only all-American "Sleepy" Floyd, will be back and North Carolina, losing only senior guard Jimmy Black, should again emerge as the ACC champion.

And, while this writer picked the ACC champions to win it all... still I would have to wonder what would have happened if the sensational young Ewing had not tried to reject everything thrown up.

Ewing was called for five goaltending calls, and you don't have to be a mathematician to figure out that's 10 big points.

Our salute goes out to coach John Thompson, who exhibited such great poise throughout the tournament. The 40-year-old Thompson made quite an impression for his great sideline coaching.

This was a very good, well-coached Hoya team and if not for that crucial turnover, with 15 ticks left on the clock, Georgetown could very well have been the ones celebrating instead of the Tarheels.

DARRYL MOTLEY

Motley goes AAA

Darryl Motley, ex-Grant High School baseball star, was cut by the Kansas City Royals and sent down to their class AAA Omaha, Nebraska, team. Motley was brought up to the parent Royal Square after performing admirably last season in Omaha.

"We expect great things out of Darryl," said Manager Whitey Herzog, "and we really expect him to be back within six weeks." Darryl suffered a minor injury during spring drills and we feel that playing time at AAA level will be most essential to his career.
