BUSINESS NOTES

The sales tax will not insulate the State of Oregon from revenue shortfalls. Regardless of the particular structure of their tax systems, a University of Oregon study shows states have been hard hit by the recession/depression and are facing serious financial troubles. According to the report, Washington and Oregon have very different revenue generating systems. Washington's is among the nation's more regressive systems and Oregon's is one of the nation's least regressive. With no personal income tax and heavy reliance on the sales tax and a state property tax, Washington theoretically is well-cushioned from the roller-coasters of our economy. However, the study found that the national recession and high interest rates have similarly affected both Washington and Oregon.

A study recently released by the Oregon Newspaper Publishers Association shows that, on a dollar-for-dollar basis, newspapers are the best media for advertising investments. Including the Portland Observer, newspapers are read by 70.3 percent of the adult population in Multnomah County. The study, conducted by Mar-Stat Market Research allows advertisers and agencies to make quantitative comparisons between newspapers and broadcast media. It is the first such study of its kind in the nation. Previously, only qualitative standards could be used to compare advertising mediums.

Here comes "Goodies-to-Go," a restaurant and rehabilitation project in downtown Portland operated by Goodwill Industries. Opened in April, the business specializes in preparing and delivering sandwiches to customers nearby. It is located on the ground floor of the Governor Building at 408 SW Second Avenue. Funding is provided through the City of Portland Jobs Training and Partnership Act (formerly CETA) and a capital investment from Goodwill Industries of Oregon. Disabled workers learn fast food preparation on-the-job at "Goodies-to-Go."

A six-session course in Public Relations for Small Business has been scheduled at Portland Community College for summer term. Not included in the PCC summer class schedule, the class begins Thursday, June 23, at the Sylvania Campus and runs weekly from 6:30-9 p.m. Tuition is $16.50.

Betty Burt, owner of a local public relations firm, will teach the class. She says it is designed to show small business owners how to use public relations to increase their profits. "Adult students without previous experience should be able to make a long range plan, know how and when to use publicity, newsletters, face-to-face communication, brochures, direct mail, and advertising as a result of taking this class," says Burt. For more information, contact Lucinda Eshleman at 244-6111 ext. 571.

While office space in 21 of the country's largest cities (including Portland) has soared 86 percent over the past five years, the national vacancy rate has almost doubled, from a 1979 low of 4 percent to 7.5 percent today. As a result, rents are dropping and construction starts have stalled, reports Dun and Bradstreet's Business Review.

Public Notice

Tri-Met's Self-Service Fare Collection Demonstration Project was reinforced by decisions made in Multnomah County District and Juvenile Courts during May.

District Judge Aaron Brown dismissed a suit alleging surcharge fare collection procedures to be unconstitutional, and Juvenile Court Judge William Riggs sentenced a minor for theft of services after an accumulation of 17 surcharge fares.

The suit was brought by Michael Micklovitch who claimed that Tri-Met should be enjoined from collecting surcharge fares. Before hearing arguments on the request for an injunction, Judge Brown entertained a Tri-Met motion for dismissal. Following those arguments, Judge Brown dismissed the case stating that Tri-Met was, as a municipal corporation, not engaged in consumer transactions as defined by state law. Judge Brown reaffirmed the Transportation District's right to remove non-paying riders from buses and to collect $20 surcharge fares by adding late fees.

Judge Brown also noted that the issuance and collection of surcharge fares was constitutional in that it afforded two opportunities for appeal. One by writing to a review committee and finally in court since Tri-Met must, under the law, appear before a judge to enforce collection of the surcharge fares and late fees.

In another case, Juvenile Court Judge William Riggs ordered a year's probation with 80 hours of community service upon a 17-year-old minor convicted of theft of services. The judge imposed the probation with the caution that any additional surcharge fares would warrant the teenager a stay at Hillcrest School for Girls. Judge Riggs had originally sentenced the girl to a year's stay at Hillcrest, a sentence which he suspended.
