Hock Shop

fill out I.D. slips on certain items. "Anything that has a serial number in radio equipment is covered. It just happened that we excluded bicycles.

"One of the biggest items stolen is silverware and we have recovered a lot through the aid of this ordinance which requires a recording of the brand name, number of serving pieces and mismatched sets."

To climax the criticism received by The Hock Shop from the community, they believe that Ford buys stolen goods and if you get ripped off today, you can go in The Hock Shop tomorrow and you might recover your stolen goods. Jay explains, "I have seen people steal items from my neighbor and turn around and sell it there. I have seen the police take out any number of items. One day he had twenty bikes. When the police left he had eight.

"Because he doesn't ask for I.D. there is no way of finding who is doing all the stealing in the community. What this place is doing is advocating people to steal who are already in that frame of mind."

Det. Busch concedes that it is a logical assumption that The Hock Shop perpetuates petty criminal behavior but can attribute no increase in burglary to its presence. "The fact that he is there and we recover stolen property does provide us with leads on the people who are professional burglars. It gives us a suspect name on which to proceed on in other areas."

Det. Busch says they recover no more or no less from The Hock Shop than from any other of the 200 second-hand stores in the city. "You can't help every once in a while buying stolen goods. When you are dealing with trade off the streets, sooner or later you are going to buy property that has been identified as stolen."

Ford sees it differently. "For once, some of the things that are stolen are getting recovered. With all the items that I buy, the police were amazed that not even half were stolen. Some officers think every Black person lined up with anything under his arm had to steal it. Thefts have always occurred in this area. The record proves it. A policeman once told me that now they know the stuff will stay in this area. They know it has been going out of the area for some time."

Jay strongly disagrees. "Before he opened up there were places to get rid of 'hot' stuff. Someone was always around to buy it. But why open a place up where everybody knows he won't ask for I.D. or ask any questions about where it came from. He will give cash out of his pockets. He might be opening an avenue to where people can reclaim their stuff, but the idea is not to encourage stealing. If he will take some precautions, a person will change his mind about taking someone else's property."

Det. Busch summarizes by stating, "They are in a risky business. Everyone knows that if you buy something for one-tenth its value, the potential for it being stolen is pretty good. I'm not against anyone in business as long as they follow the rules that everyone else follows."

Jay concludes his concerns by stating, "The business could be a good place where you can buy something and not have to pay top dollar for it. But until it is run like a business it will be a hangnail. If he doesn't change something real soon, I will get together with my neighbors and start a petition about the place. If he is not going to run it properly, why keep it there? It is just hurting the community."

Ford concludes with a different note. "We are helping the economy. A lot of women come in with babies on their arms who are selling their record players to feed their families. They tell me that this program has been cut and that program has been cut. Most people need the money or they wouldn't sell their things."

"If they really feel strongly that they should buy clear over on Interstate or at 123rd and Division, it is up to them. We are the only second-hand store that is operating within the law in this area. We are providing a service. If they don't want us here, they are not showing it. Business is great — both buying and selling."
