

Minority students visit P.S.U.

by Robert Lothian

Over 200 minority high school students from around Oregon visited Portland State University last week.

The third annual "on campus field trip" enabled the students to get a head start on education and career planning, and to meet each other and have some fun.

"We invite sophomores, juniors and seniors from all over the state," said PSU affirmative action admission counselor Maria Alanis. Hispanic, Black, American Indian and Asian students came from Portland, Salem, Woodburn and small communities like Gervais, said Alanis, who is responsible for minority student outreach.

The visiting high schoolers listened to deans outline the various PSU departmental programs, took a tour of the campus and were entertained by a jazz band after lunch. Elaine A. Engelstad, an American Indian and attorney who graduated from PSU, gave a morale building talk on how to make it in the high power urban education environment.

The PSU affirmative action office has taken the lead among state institutions of higher education in offering the visitations, said Alanis.

PSU offers classes, degree programs, and foreign study opportunities of interest to minority students. In addition, advising, financial planning and aid, tutoring and other support is available to help them stay in school once they enter, she said.

One of the visitors was a young Hispanic woman from a low-income family in Gervais who plans to study business administration and become an accountant. "She wants to be somebody some day," said Alanis. "She wants to prove to everyone else, especially her parents, that she can do it; that is, succeed in higher education."

Major Morris, director of affirmative action at PSU, said most minority students come from family backgrounds with no higher education experience, and where college is not a viable option. They don't get the preparation or attention they need, he said, and are often channeled for failure by an insensitive educational system.

Minority students are "holding steady" at PSU, he said, but their future is clouded by more stringent entry requirements and looming budget cuts. Families below the poverty level will be hit hard by the changes, which he sees as a trend toward "creating an elitist educational system," he said.

Baloney Joe's opens dental

by Robert Lothian

Vista volunteer La Tonya Green was the first patient at Baloney Joe's new dental clinic last week.

"My heart is racing and I'm very scared," said Green, who will be in charge of the clinic's operation.

Dr. Ben Curtis had just given her a shot of Novacaine and was preparing to fill a cavity. Curtis, president of the Oregon Dental Association, did the groundwork to get the clinic open. He organized a pool of 35 dentists who will volunteer at the clinic, which was designed to meet the dental care needs of the homeless poor.

Dr. Hank Van Hassel, Dean of the School of Dentistry, University of Oregon Health Science University, said that dental students will also be helping at the clinic.

About $16,000 worth of equipment for a complete dental office was donated by Adec, Inc., of Newberg. "If this is a grand opening, it's also a grand experience for us," said Ken Austin, president of Adec.

Curtis said other clinics for low income people in Portland were "way over demand," and dental care for the homeless was being neglected.

Michael Stoops, director of Baloney Joe's, said that some clinics have long waiting lists and require a phone number and small donation which makes it hard for the homeless to get their teeth taken care of.

Stoops said people are coming into Baloney Joe's in severe pain with toothaches. Others have lost their dentures. "They're neglecting their dental care because they can't afford it," he said.

With the new dental clinic, he said, "We'll be able to monitor medical and dental health a heck of a lot better." Baloney Joe's also operates a medical clinic.

The dental clinic will open Monday, Wednesday and Friday afternoons at Baloney Joe's, 313 E. Burnside St.
