Career Opportunities

Registered Nurses

Today, career opportunities for professional nurses are greater than ever before. In hospitals, home settings, doctors' offices, clinics, health maintenance organizations and a variety of specialized institutions, nurses are assuming new roles and new responsibilities.

As nurses' responsibilities have expanded so have standards and requirements for nursing education. A generation ago, nurses were prepared in two-to-three year programs. For today's nurse, a four-year Bachelor of Science degree in Nursing is becoming essential. That's because it broadens working knowledge of the biological, physical, social and behavioral sciences; builds skills in critical thinking, clinical investigation and decision making; and helps ensure professional advancement.

A free booklet by the American Nurses' Association offers information on finding the program that's right for you, applying for admission and financial aid, and a list of accredited Baccalaureate programs. One-time World Heavyweight Boxing Champ George Foreman enjoys combining renewed boxing success and preaching with the joy of his family.

George Foreman: Fighting For Scholars

Former heavyweight champion George Foreman is making a boxing comeback to finance college scholarships, reports the June EBONY.

"Everybody wants to know why I'm making a comeback after so long," says Foreman who returns 30 pounds heavier and 10 years later. "They want to say the answer is money. They're RIGHT, but for all the WRONG reasons." Foreman, who says he has enough money in a trust to take care of he and his family the rest of their lives, explains the real reason he's returned to boxing is to help students get through college. He says, "when $20,000 lets 20 kids finish their education it's like a gold mine."

Foreman also continues his seven-year pastorate of a small congregation in Houston, and enjoys life with his fifth wife and baby daughter, as he trains for his goal of a title fight in six months.

Scholarship Funds

Students and their parents should know there are many possible sources of educational aid around these days.

"The private sector, often a hidden source, consists of thousands of corporations, unions, trust funds, associations and even private philanthropists offering educational assistance to the interested student," points out

Alexander Sidar, Director of Screening for the Coors Veterans' Memorial Scholarship Fund and higher educational consultant.

One of the newest sources of corporate funding for education is Adolph Coors Company. Targeting a special group for its financial assistance,

People

Make a Difference . . .

in Mental Health

In the next decade people will have to keep pace with an ever-changing world. High school and college institutions will offer specialized technical training required by today's job market. Young people will be asked to grow up faster, compete better, and achieve more. Families will also experience increased pressure as members deal with parenting issues, interpersonal relationships, emotional crisis, legal issues and personal loss.

Mental Health professionals help individuals, couples and families to resolve difficulties in their lives. Specialists work to assist others in becoming more sociable, productive and self-reliant. It is challenging work and success often comes slowly, yet the rewards are many.

Today, Mental Health Centers employ people of many skills and training. Some examples include:

- Social Workers
- Medical personnel
- Psychologists
- Clerical personnel and Support Staff
- Occupational and Recreational Therapists
- Administrators
- Nurses
- Geriatric Specialists
- Financial Managers

Vicky Collins

"Clearly mental health work is not an occupation for everyone. But if you are examining work in the service-oriented professions, we encourage you to consider a career as a Mental Health Specialist."
