Freeway Speed
Not For Everyone

When Oregon's new rural interstate freeway speed limit goes into effect the last week in September, not everyone will be allowed to go 65 all the time.

"The law in Oregon requires a 55 mile-an-hour maximum speed for trucks and non-commercial buses, such as worker transport, church and school buses. That will hold true even in the sections that are signed for 65 for the rest of the driving public," said L.E. George, Highway Division traffic engineer.

George told the Transportation Commission Tuesday that all drivers will have to slow down on two sections of Interstate 5 because of safety considerations.

One section near Mrytle Creek will remain at the present posted speed of 50 miles-per-hour due to a series of sharp curves. An 11 mile section of I-5 from south of Ashland to the California state line will also keep the current 55 mile-per-hour speed as it traverses the steep grades and tight curves of the Siskiyou Summit.

The federal speed law allowing states to raise rural freeway speeds will also keep urban freeways in Medford, Eugene, Salem and Portland at 55 miles-per-hour, George said.

Altogether, 16 percent of Oregon's 720 mile long interstate system will stay at 55 miles-per-hour or less, George added.

Street Gangs in Portland Topic for Meeting

Sgt. Steve Hollingsworth of the Portland Public School Police will be speaking on the subject of street gangs in Portland at the next meeting of the East Precinct Citizens Advisory Council, Thursday, August 6 at 7:30 p.m.

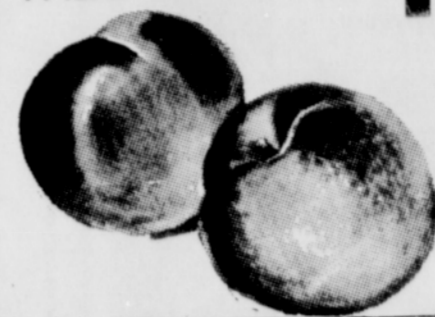

East Precinct is located at 4735 East Burnside.

The East Precinct Citizens Advisory Council meets monthly providing a forum for the community and the police to come together, discuss crime and related concerns, and facilitate a greater understanding and cooperation between them. The public is welcome and encouraged to participate.
