HUMAN RIGHTS ACTIVIST VISITS PORTLAND

By: Avel Gordly

Human rights activist Dr. Mildred McClain-Coleman believes that "it is crucial that Black people and other Third World people become more involved in what is happening in Nicaragua... Black people in the U.S. are not speaking out because of a lack of understanding of what is at stake in Nicaragua." McClain-Coleman spoke these words several times, to different audiences, during her recent Portland visit, November 11-16.

A dynamic speaker, McClain-Coleman has a doctorate in education from Harvard, is currently Project Director of the Georgia Coalition on Hunger and serves as organizer for the Witness for Peace, Atlantic Coast project in Nicaragua. Her Portland trip came just 10 days after her most recent journey to the Atlantic Coast, as part of an African American delegation which she organized. While in Portland she encouraged more local activism in the Black Community around the issue of U.S. involvement in Central America; sought recruits for future delegations; and supported the work of a few local activists who have been raising the issue in Black and Latino Communities.

McClain-Coleman argued convincingly to her audiences against U.S. aid to the Contras. She cited the fact that the people of the Atlantic Coast, where there is a sizable Black population, "want to raise their children in peace."

This was the message she shared as she spoke with the aid of moving slides of children and families involved in everyday life. Her audiences included children at the Black Educational Center, a Black United Front meeting and students at the Whitney Young Learning Center. In addition, she spoke to a group of Black women representing several organizations and to some activists in the Latino community.

One of the highlights of McClain-Coleman's visit was a presentation to the Roosevelt High School Student Council. The council has been engaged in a debate about whether to allow Coca-Cola machines to remain on campus in the face of a national boycott, which has been called by the Coke Campaign in Atlanta, Georgia. McClain-Coleman was the first coordinator of the Coke Campaign and was able to help some of the Roosevelt students gain a deeper understanding of the reasons for the boycott.

Her trip was sponsored by Witness for Peace with assistance from the American Friends Service Committee and the Black United Front.
