mobilize D.C.'s citizens including the youth to confront the crisis of drugs, violence, crime and murder which is ravishing the city. The city needs hope, a program to solve the crisis, and someone at the helm who can motivate people to become involved in helping to solve the massive problems facing their community. Jackson Action is just what the doctor ordered.

On the question of the danger of drugs to our families, communities and nation, it was Jesse Jackson who raised this issue to the level of national defense and national security during his 1988 presidential campaign. He speaks to thousands of young people each and every week exhorting them to live a drug free life and his personal credibility on this question is impeccable. But Jesse Jackson also understands the root causes of drugs, crime and violence. He is capable of challenging America to move beyond the flawed policy of building more prisons and locking up more prisoners to policies which promote human development-education daycare housing, healthcare and decent jobs.

Indeed Washington, D.C. would be an excellent laboratory for Jackson to institute a version of his program to utilize public pension funds for infra-structure development. And Washington, D.C.'s numerous neighborhood associations and its structure of Advisory Neighborhood Commissions could be mobilized under Jackson's leadership to spearhead people based community economic development programs to assist in alleviating the problem, of grinding poverty which plagues many of D.C.'s neighborhoods.

Putting together an administration to manage the affairs of Washington, D.C. is another asset which Jesse Jackson would bring to the mayor's office. As the most famous mayor in the world, Jackson would attract the most talented, skilled and committed planners, administrators and managers in the nation. There are legions of highly motivated and managers in the nation. There are legions of highly motivated and highly skilled people who would line up for a chance to be a part of a Jackson administration in Washington, D.C.

Then there is the matter of self-determination and statehood for Washington, D.C. What better person than Jesse Jackson to organize the national support, congressional district by congressional district, to persuade the Congress to grant full statehood to Washington, D.C. Jackson's supporters from around the nation would be stimulated to spring into action around this question. In the present climate, not only does D.C. not have full statehood, some officials within the Bush administration and members of Congress are openly discussing rescinding D.C.'s limited home rule form of government. The power of a Jackson mayoralty would halt this discussion instantly.

Finally there is the question of Jesse Jackson's future presidential aspirations. A successful tenure as Mayor of the nations's capital would bury the false issue of Jackson's lack of experience as an elected official. Given this stature as a national and international leader, Jesse Jackson could not only transform the politics, policies and conditions in D.C., but forcefully impact national and international policy as well. Jesse Jackson would give a whole new meaning to the title, Mayor of Washington, D.C. It would take on national and international significance.

Instead of 1992 Jackson should set his sights on 1996. Incumbent presidents are seldom unseated anyway. So why waste precious human energy and resources on a doubtful proposition. Washington, D.C. could become the base to build a solid record in terms of turning that city around, while simultaneously erecting a bridge to the White House in 1996. I say Run Jesse Run! Win Jesse Win!

Jackson Action in Nation's Capital?

A few weeks ago rumors began to race around the nation that Jesse Louis Jackson was contemplating running for Mayor of the embattled city, of Washington D. C. Observers noted that renovation work seemed to be underway on the Jackson family's D.C. residence and that Jesse Jackson had stepped up his number of appearances in the capital in recent weeks. Speculation reached a fever pitch when Jackson acknowledged that the question had been raised with him by a number of people. While declining to say he would in fact run, Jackson seemed to leave the door open to the possibility. The prospect of Jesse Jackson running for Mayor of Washington, D.C. has understandably provoked a great deal of debate and discussion. Well, here's my two cents worth.

Jesse Jackson should seek the office of Mayor of Washington, D.C. His election would be good for the nation's capital and good for America. Jackson's vision, inspirational leadership and proven skills at resolving crises are precisely what Washington, D.C. needs at this juncture. Jesse Jackson unlike any other leader on the scene today could
