Nike global labor practices report

REPORTS NIKE DOING "GOOD JOB IN FACTORIES...CAN AND SHOULD DO BETTER"

Former UN Ambassador, Mayor of Atlanta, civil rights and human rights leader Andrew Young issued a 75-page report in Atlanta recently that evaluated Nike's Code of Conduct in some detail as it is applied to the factories that produce Nike goods and apparel.

In the report, Young concluded that, "Nike is doing a good job, but it can and should do better."

Background

Young and his firm, GoodWorks International, has been working for six months on this project which it undertook at Nike's request. As conditions for his work, Young requested the right to talk with any person he wanted, to review confidential Nike audits and other documents, to visit factories that he selected, to talk with factory workers and members of the human rights and labor communities and to make his final report public.

Nike CEO Phil Knight agreed to all of these conditions, telling Young that he should, "Go anywhere, see anything and talk to anybody." Knight also agreed to make Young's report public.

As disclosed in the report, Young and GoodWorks International has undertaken an extensive list of tasks including:

- Traveled to twelve factories in three Asian countries: Vietnam,

China and Indonesia [those twelve factories represent more than one-third Nike's global production];

- Met with and talked with factory workers, labor representatives and others, usually without Nike or factory management present;
- Met with human rights, labor and other groups in each of those three countries, without Nike present;
- Had separate meetings and discussions with international and U.S. based human rights and labor groups and with Nike's harshest critics;
- Had access to and reviewed confidential, independent audit reports of these same factories conducted by Ernst and Young since 1994; and,
- Met with Nike's labor practices staff and with plant managers in each of the three countries visited.

Findings & Observations

The highlights of his work were summarized in the "findings & Observations" section, and include:

1. "The factories we visited that produce Nike goods were clean, organized, adequately ventilated and well lit. They certainly did not appear to be what most Americans would call "sweatshops."
2. "I found no evidence or pattern of widespread or systematic abuse or mistreatment of workers in these twelve factories."
3. Generally speaking, these twelve factories are controlled by absentee owners, managed by expatriated who, in Vietnam particularly, do not speak the local language fluently and are overseen by a relatively small number of Nike technical supervisors focused largely on quality control.

4. The concept of "workers rights" is not a well-developed or well-understood principle in the three Asian countries where Nike and its major competitors produce shoes and apparel.

5. Some system of third party monitoring is necessary because of the ownership structure of these Asian Factories.

6. In some factories, workers are offered housing as part of their compensation, but it is entirely voluntary. By Western standards, the rooms are small and the furniture sparse. The workers I talked with said that it was "better than their home."

7. There needs to be a better system to enable individual factory workers to file a complaint or grievance and know that it will be seriously considered and/or investigated.

8. The Nike Code of Conduct should be the basis of the relationship between Nike, the plant ownership and management and the workers. The Code is not visible on the factory floors and not well understood by the workers.
