

Tony Hopson Sr., President of Self Enhancement

"The dream was not only about equality and diversity, it was about responsibility, courage and vision. As adults we must be willing to set the example for our youth to follow. Martin did that and it was good. In recent history we haven't done that, and it has been unacceptable. What are you willing to do about it? What is Equality and Diversity to you?"

Martin Luther King Jr.'s Colleague To Speak At UO

The national Martin Luther King Jr. holiday is as much about human rights as it is about black-white relations, says King's close friend and associate, Pastor James M. Lawson Jr.

Lawson, who collaborated with King to develop the philosophy of nonviolence that became the cornerstone of the civil rights movement, will speak at the University of Oregon on Jan. 15, the 69th anniversary of King's birth.

The free public lecture, "Where Do We Go From Here: Chaos or Community?" begins at 4 p.m., Thursday, Jan. 15, in the Ballroom of the Erb Memorial Union, 1222 E. 13th Ave. Lawson also will speak with local community leaders at 8 p.m. on Thursday in the EMU Ballroom. Sponsored by the Oregon Humanities Center, both events are open to the public.

"The press and most Americans saw Dr. King and the movement he represented as primarily for black people," Lawson says. "However, King himself saw his movement as an effort to get America to redeem her soul."

Lawson says America must live up to the promise of the preamble to the Constitution by basing our national values on the ideas it contains.

"We still have time to make a choice," he says. "We can become a nation where every child has a good chance or we can face the reality of growing chaos."

"Pastor Lawson is an unusual, very inspiring man. He has worked for a just society with remarkable single-mindedness and integrity his entire life," says Spencie Love, UO adjunct professor of history, who is working on a biography of Lawson.

Lawson has been pastor of the Holman United Methodist Church in Los Angeles since 1974. He is national chairman of the Fellowship of Reconciliation, the oldest pacifist organization in the country.

The talk and the community meeting are part of a series of UO events planned in honor of Martin Luther King Jr. The campus observance includes a free public forum on the status and future of civil rights in the United States at 4 p.m., Friday, Jan. 16, and a speech by Cornel West, author of "Race Matters" and "Restoring Hope," at 4 p.m., Thursday, Jan. 29. Sponsored by the Oregon Humanities Center, both events will be held in the Ballroom of the Erb Memorial Union.
